Molecular Ecology publishes papers that utilize molecular genetic techniques to address consequential questions in ecology, evolution, behaviour and conservation. We discourage papers that are primarily descriptive and relevant only to the taxon being studied. Studies may employ neutral markers for inference about ecological and evolutionary processes or examine ecologically important genes and their products directly. Molecular Ecology concentrates on primary research articles (i.e. Original Articles) but operates a flexible policy regarding other submissions, including Reviews, Opinion Articles and Comments. We also publish articles on technical methods, computer programs and genetics resource development in our companion publication, Molecular Ecology Resources. We typically provide an editorial decision on new submissions within 4 to 8 weeks, and papers usually appear in print 6 to 10 weeks after receipt of the final manuscript.
